I have taken out the Cat's and backed out the O2 sensors with a special modification to some anti-knock plugs. I am about to have a custom program done and hope to have before and after dyno #'s. Biggest advantage was removing the cat's to let it breath. I am looking into changing to an electric cooling fan and also changing the thermostat out.

The thermostat can cause this issue but since by turning it off and back on and it works fine every time then most likely it is the control board for the furnace and it will need replaced. Really the only way to know for sure is to check the wires from the thermostat to the furnace for continuity when the furnace stops working.
