The Daily Planet was also the name of a column appearing in DC Comics to advertise upcoming projects. Discrepancies between Earth-Two and the actual Golden Age stories caused E. Nelson Bridwell to suggest the existence of an "Alternate Earth-Two" (Earth-Two-A) which was formally canonized in The Official Crisis on Infinite Earths Index (March 1986). Strictly speaking there wasn't an Earth-Two Daily Planet.

Since its first appearance in 1940, the Daily Planet has been as much a monument to truth and justice as Superman himself. In the midst of Action Comics' "The House of Kent" story arc, it is discovered that DC's most famous newspaper is actually owned by Marisol Leone and the Invisible Mafia. It hardly seems likely that a periodical purchased by a criminal element could ever remain trustworthy and impartial, and many of the papers' top reporters are committed to removing it from ...
